Graham Daniel is a lecturer in Educational Psychology and Child Development has a background in primary school education and as a consultant in schools. Graham’s research interests include child development, the early years of schooling, families and schools, and teacher education. Graham is currently involved in research analysing data from the Longitudinal Study of Australian Children.